

I feel that the no call list needs to be more properly marketed to the public. I would guess that the general household that is getting harassed by telemarketers on a daily basis are not aware of the list available to them. Telemarketing is invasion of privacy, and completely annoying. It is the equivalent to a salesman coming to your doorstep 12 times a day and not taking no for an answer. In fact the only way you are able to end conversations with many telemarketers is to hang up on him/her. The national database list of non-calls should be something that your local telephone company should promote to you on a regular basis. Again...I feel that the list will eventually be effective, but has to be more properly marketed.

On the topic of company specific do not call lists...I feel that it is definitely too difficult to keep track of what companies are calling you. If I receive a telemarketing call and tell them immediately to put me on their not call lists, how can I possibly keep track of all of the companies that I tell this to? Also, as an average citizen, I am not aware of what exactly to do if a company calls me that I have previously told not to.
